Part 1 Executive Summary

1. The Rationale for Opening the New Program or Revising the Program

The 2026 curriculum revision Blueprint has written and made a revision that arises from the different perspective grown out of the conflicting elements in a problem, related to and identified with the previous program's framework as they appear to find distinguished factors and involving conditions that functioned to be reflected and improved.

These reconstructions of curriculum drive and targets the fundamental but yet specific factors in the operational conditions that required adjustment. The dataset was collected in alignment with the viewpoints, feedback, observations, and discussions with all key stakeholders. These include Communication design program staffs, industrial sectors, creative partnerships, and most significantly of all our students and alumni regarding their learning experience, learning process, and academic journey through the course completion.

The revised curriculum focuses on building growing potential, and related developing future opportunities while maintaining to proactively ensuring to tackle problems and limitations in order to enhance and strengthens communication design program identity as a leader in design excellence.

It is crucial to address the evolving factors and shifting paradigms transforming efficiency, workflows, and aesthetics in communication design education in the wider range of creative industries including the weaknesses of communication design program's operation and management. These challenges can be viewed as a positive force for cultivating emerging capabilities.

The discovery in urgency of essential frameworks that define the driving force and factors to the trajectory of communication design revision can be configured as;

1. The escalating need of orientation and contextualization to experiential learning and practice-based learning that enhances foundation to design thinking, design skillset, and answer problems to demands in professional industry as well as emerging industry and markets; preparing graduates for industry leadership
2. The rapid technological shifts in AI tools, Generative AI literacy, digital applications, and technological tools that reconfigure design workflows, and drive operational cost reductions

3. An awareness of a growing number of competitors in the field of communication design education that effect demographic number of communication design students intakes to be declined
4. An essential management to enrich classroom discourse, and internationalized learning environment by enhancing the program's international appeal and increase number of international students
5. Graduates require a robust curriculum that prepares them for international career pathways and global design leadership
6. The growing and escalating expectation of highly skilled talent by leading organizations
7. The ensuring to comply with KMUTT's institutional vision that prioritizes integrated innovation and learning towards real world exposure to maximize community, social value, and sustainable social impact
8. The comprehensive dataset, critical, and evaluate feedback complied from all stakeholders
9. The collective aesthetic pathways that define communication design study with skills and competencies in visual & sound design. The integrated core specializations including;
 - Graphic Design & Typography
 - Illustration Art & Publication
 - Web Design & Digital, Interactive and Experiential Design (UX/UI)
 - 3D Based Communication Design (Motion Graphic & Animation)
 - Film, Photography, and Multimedia
 - Social Innovation Design
 - Brand Communication and Brand Identity Design
 - The Aesthetic Subversion: Craft, Hand drawn elemental design, Tactile Craft, and Micro industrial

In consequence, these conditioned frameworks are the factors that communication design program need to prioritize, and adapt to progress. By systematically focusing on the frameworks, the program can discard outdated constraints and reshape communication design education. This ongoing adaptation ensures the curriculum remains agile, resilient, and perfectly equipped to support advanced creative practices and emerging global standards

Communication design program: Core Philosophy

In order to navigate the changes of the revision effectively, communication design study dedicates to excellence, aligning our core philosophy with a forward-thinking orientation to lead the field of design education.

A re-evaluation of communication design core philosophy brings forwards the critical key revision process, how to systematically re-organizing the curriculum to foster strategic academic and professional growth. This updated revision must ensure to elevate quality, standards, and overall value of communication design program, centering its focus and core philosophy on creative practices, visual design-oriented projects, and critical thinking through a rooted process of research, contextual inquiry, and integrated innovation.

Furthermore, this core philosophy pivots toward student-centered and practice-based learning, a paradigm and essential value designed to cultivate industry leadership and equip graduates with comprehensive understanding of different scales of entrepreneurship. Seamlessly structured and grounded in a lifelong learning mindset, this curriculum revision continues to guarantee an enduring commitment to students' sustainable well-being, human centric community care, and meaningful societal contributions.

Curriculum Revision: Key objectives

- A distinct set of problems determine the objectives, which can be defined as;
- Revisit vision: Defining a modern, effective, and creative direction for the program
- Assess capabilities: Analyze current program strengths and weaknesses alongside future skill demands, national economic policies, the evolving profession of design and communication
- Optimize operations: Restructure the organization of academic courses; the reduction and merged group of communication design study's overall credit system
- Enhance learning experience: Improve studio accessibility, inspiring creativity in the updated revision and prioritize student wellbeing by providing various forms of learning experience with a focus on integrated innovation, practice-oriented learning, and the application of technology in communication design study
- Professional framework: Revise guidance policies to ensure and optimize student progression and career readiness
- Refine program learning outcome (PLOs): clarifying and highlighting the achievements of students when they graduate

2. The Product Concept of the New Program or the Main Concept of the Revised Program

Amid rising competition within communication design education, establishing a modern, innovative program requires measurable and high-performing learning outcomes. These metrics include alumni success, elevated student satisfaction and well-being, a robust balance of academic and practical knowledge, and deep industry networks.

Consequently, this curriculum revision—with its strategic focus on refining thesis frameworks, serves as a vital catalyst to attract both domestic and international students. By fortifying the program's cultural production, the School of Architecture and Design (SOA+D) secures its position as a leading design school in Thailand that meets global standards. This evolution elevates the program's reputation within Asian and international contexts, reinforcing its distinctive brand identity as an active learning experience dedicated to design excellence and a lifelong mastery of design thinking, skillsets, and aesthetics.

The product concept of this revised program is built on four core value propositions:

1. The Design Excellence incubator: The future-proof Curriculum

Active & Practice-Based Learning: Progressing into the core specializations of practice-based learning to a high-utility, studio-heavy model where students learn by tackling real-world industry demands

Dual Mastery of Form and Thought: The product teaches technical tool proficiency; it balances it equally with deep design thinking, semiotics, psychology, design history, and visual/sound aesthetics to ensure long-term career adaptability and achievement

2. The Differentiator: Scalable Design Entrepreneurship

Rather than preparing graduates to be mid-level employees, the revised product acts as an accelerator that equips students with a comprehensive understanding of different scales of entrepreneurship. The communication design program supports deep industry networks, international faculty, and responsive market exposure

Graduates ready to launch independent studios, manage cross-disciplinary freelance networks, or lead creative departments

3. The Feature: The Strategic Course Framework

The academic courses and curriculum blend an academic centric exercise and research into a practical and hands-on skillset for future exposure to professional requirements, standards, and media visibility. The building of portfolio that demonstrates a student's ability to bridge advanced theoretical research with high-end, commercial-grade cultural production

4. The Ecosystem: "Bangkok city and Bangkhuntian Green Campus as a commercial value proposition of vital resources"

The program leverages its strategic location in Bangkok and Bangkhuntian green campus—a vibrant regional creative hub among its coastal geography, mangrove forest ecosystem—to provide direct access to eco-aesthetics, environmental communication, and acoustic ecology while maintaining the global connection with various industrial sectors. Both Thai and International students can work directly with local entrepreneurs to rebrand, design package, visual outcomes, activities, communication, and product in sustainable projects upscaling local cultural production to reach international standards.

3. Issues changed from the former version of the program can be summarized as follows:

3.1) Revise the program learning outcomes (PLOs) corresponding to align with the needs of the key stakeholders.

The Program Learning Outcome (PLOs) are revised due to

The Program Learning Outcomes (PLOs) are revised due to the need to update the curriculum in response to current changes in communication design practice, particularly the growing impact of emerging technologies and AI-assisted tools. The revision is intentionally minor, as the existing PLOs remain relevant to the core identity of the program. The updated PLOs aim to ensure that students are aware of how AI influences contemporary design practice, can apply AI-assisted tools appropriately beyond a general user level, and can use such tools with ethical and professional responsibility.

3.2) Improve the Program structure as following:

Explain the reasons of the changes.

This revision aims to create a more coherent, flexible, and student-centered curriculum while maintaining the core strengths of Communication Design education by streamlining the curriculum structure. The revised structure reduces overlapping content, improve learning progression, deeper studio engagement and greater flexibility for student development. The previous curriculum was highly workload-intensive, with students experiencing workloads of 58 - 61 hrs./ Week, which is too much. After revision it come down to 53- 55 hrs./ Week Which is a well balance numbers compare to the competitor, by remove 2 courses from the syllabus and integrate the core of those course into each communication design courses (research and design methodology)

The revised structure also creates more space for elective learning, interdisciplinary experiences, and independent exploration, supporting students in developing individual interests and pathways throughout their studies. The program now features flexible slots Across Years 2 and 3 instead of a fixed schedule. This change allows students to decide whether to focus on their workload or take additional courses in one semester, or any combination. So total credit is 132 (from 142) This revision represents an important step toward a more integrated learning experience while preserving the identity and educational values of the Communication Design program.

Adjust courses in the program as following details:

1. Integration of Research Methodology and Design Methodology

The previous curriculum included Research Methodology (CMD 231) and Design Methodology (CMD 232) as standalone courses. Curriculum review identified that many of the concepts and processes introduced in these courses were subsequently revisited within studio courses, resulting in overlapping content and a relatively high student workload. Student feedback also indicated that the curriculum would benefit from a more balanced workload, additional opportunities for technical skill development, and greater engagement with project-based learning.

The revised curriculum therefore integrates research and design methodologies into relevant studio and project-based courses rather than delivering them as separate subjects. This approach enables students to develop methodological knowledge within authentic design projects while strengthening the connection between research, design process, and studio practice. The integration also contributes to a more coherent learning sequence and a more manageable workload without reducing the intended learning outcomes.

2. Flexible Free Electives and Independent Learning

The revised curriculum introduces a more flexible structure for the two Free Elective courses by allowing students to complete them at any point across Years 2 and 3 instead of following a fixed semester schedule. This arrangement provides greater flexibility for students to manage their individual study plans according to their workload, learning pace, and academic interests. Students may choose to complete elective courses earlier to broaden their learning experiences or postpone them to focus on studio courses during more intensive semesters.

The revision also expands opportunities for elective learning by increasing access to courses offered within the Communication Design program and across other disciplines. Students are encouraged to explore different areas of practice, work with different instructors, and engage with emerging topics beyond the core curriculum. In addition, students may undertake Independent Study (CMD 463) or propose Special Study projects under faculty supervision, enabling self-directed exploration in areas that support their individual interests and professional development. Together, these revisions provide greater flexibility for students to shape their own learning pathways while maintaining the coherence of the overall curriculum.

3. Revision of CMD 455

The course CMD 455 – Preparation for Professional Life has been renamed CMD 455 – Exhibition Management and Public Relations to better reflect its revised scope and learning outcomes. The revision is based on the program's experience in managing annual thesis exhibitions and public showcase events, where exhibition planning and public communication have become integral components of the students' final-year learning experience.

The revised course focuses on the planning, organization, promotion, and management of communication design exhibitions. Students develop knowledge and practical experience in exhibition planning, installation, public relations, documentation, and collaboration with internal and external stakeholders. The revision strengthens the integration between the final thesis process and public presentation, ensuring that students are prepared not only to produce design outcomes but also to communicate and present their work effectively in professional and public contexts.

3.3) The curriculum establishes the Learning Pathway named Visual Designer (Visual Storytelling and Audiovisual Design) that leads to career/competency in visual storytelling, concept development, and audiovisual design. Students learn to translate research and ideas into compelling visual communication through motion, narrative structures, and sound–visual relationships.

The pathway emphasizes visual mapping, narrative thinking, and the creation of time-based media that can support storytelling and audiovisual performance contexts, including music and stage-based productions. Students develop the ability to research, formulate design concepts, and transform them into coherent visual experiences.

Through this process, learners cultivate creative thinking, experimentation, and reflective practice. The pathway encourages independent exploration and supports the development of lifelong learning habits and a growth mindset within the evolving field of communication design.

3.3) The curriculum defines a total of 1 Learning Pathways as follows:

Learning Pathway 1 : Visual Designer (Visual Storytelling and Audiovisual Design)

This pathway comprises 3 OBEM courses, totaling 9 credits.

Learning Outcomes of the Learning Pathway:

Create visual storytelling and audiovisual design outcomes by integrating research, concept development, visual media, motion, and sound for screen-based and performance-based contexts.

3.4) Other issues

The program recognizes the increasing importance of alumni engagement as many graduates have established successful careers and gained strong professional recognition across the communication design and creative industries. The revised curriculum therefore places greater emphasis on strengthening relationships with alumni through guest lectures, studio critiques, portfolio reviews, industry visits, mentoring activities, and collaborative projects. These engagements provide students with opportunities to learn from current professional practice, broaden their career perspectives, and strengthen the connection between the curriculum and the evolving design industry.

The program also recognizes the need to improve the overall student learning experience by addressing the cumulative workload across courses. While the curriculum revision has reduced overall curriculum density through course integration and restructuring, effective workload management also requires coordination at the program level. Faculty members will therefore continue to plan course schedules, project milestones, and major assignments collectively to ensure a balanced distribution of student workload throughout each semester. This coordinated approach aims to support deeper learning, maintain the quality of student work, and promote students' academic well-being by reducing unnecessary workload overlap and excessive pressure.

Part 2 Program Design and Concept

2.1) Rationale for Opening or Revising the Program and Processes Involved in Defining the Concept of the Program.

2.1.1) Stakeholder Requirements Gathering Processes and the Conversion of Voice of Customer (VOC) to Voice of Process (VOP) for Opening or Revising the Program.

The process of selecting stakeholders for the curriculum revision involved internal discussion within the Communication Design Program to identify key stakeholder groups, appropriate representatives, and suitable methods of data collection. The program used multiple channels to gather requirements, including online surveys for stakeholder groups, alumni, current students, and recent graduates; one-on-one interviews conducted during guest speaker sessions and external site visits; feedback from Cooperative Study reflection forms submitted by both students and host organizations before and after the internship period; and focus groups and one-on-one interviews with current students.

Stakeholders were selected from groups that are directly related to the learning journey and professional context of Communication Design. These included:

1. Current Students: representatives from Years 2–4 of the Communication Design program.
2. Alumni: graduates from cohorts 8–20.
3. Stakeholders from the professional field, divided into 4 groups:
 - Established professionals in the design industry who have previously worked with Communication Design students or graduates
 - Guest speakers and invited professionals who are established in the design industry but have not directly worked with Communication Design
 - Alumni from cohorts 1–7 who are already established in the design industry and were invited to provide feedback in the role of stakeholders
 - Professional networks of individual faculty members, gathered across different areas of communication design practice

The collected data were analyzed and synthesized to identify the Voice of Customer (VOC), focusing on expectations, strengths, gaps, and future needs in relation to Communication Design education. These findings were then translated into the Voice of Process (VOP) by using them to inform curriculum improvement in areas such as course structure, learning experiences, professional readiness, and program learning outcomes.

The process was conducted during the curriculum revision period through combined online and in-person methods in order to gather feedback from multiple groups and ensure that the revised curriculum reflects both educational and professional needs.

2.1.1.1) Exploration of Labor Market Needs

The findings show that the labor market continues to value creative thinking and design fundamentals as core strengths of Communication Design graduates. At the same time, employers increasingly expect stronger professional communication, business and client awareness, understanding of real-world workflow, project ownership, and the ability to work across platforms and collaborative contexts. Stakeholders also emphasized the growing importance of adaptability, critical thinking, presentation and pitching, and the responsible use of AI and emerging tools.

The collected feedback was treated as the Voice of Customer (VOC) and translated into the Voice of Process (VOP) through curriculum revision. These findings were used to inform the direction of curriculum improvement, especially in relation to learning outcomes, course content, learning experiences, and the balance between creative development and professional readiness in Communication Design.

2.1.1.2) Exploration of Current Students Needs

Current students generally view Communication Design Program positively as a supportive environment that encourages creativity, experimentation, research, and self-discovery. Many respondents felt that the program helped them better understand Communication Design as a field while strengthening design thinking, concept development, visual communication, and collaboration.

At the same time, students identified several areas for improvement. Key concerns include uneven workload distribution, overlapping deadlines, and the need for clearer course aims, assessment criteria, and feedback. Students also expressed a strong desire for more real-world learning opportunities, such as client-based projects, internships, studio visits, and stronger preparation for professional practice, including project management, pricing, and budgeting. In addition, they requested more systematic support in technical and software skills, as well as practical and responsible use of AI. Overall, students value CMD's strengths but expect a clearer, more balanced, and more industry-connected curriculum.

2.1.1.3) Exploration of the Needs of other Stakeholder Groups; for example, Prospective Students, Alumni, Academic Staff, Supporting Staff, Parents, etc.

The program explored the needs of alumni through an online survey with both structured and open-ended questions. Alumni were selected because they can reflect directly on how the curriculum supported them in real professional contexts after graduation.

The survey gathered information on career pathways, current roles, curriculum relevance, strengths of the program, skill gaps, industry expectations, AI-related change, and suggestions for curriculum improvement. Responses were considered across different career stages, including recent graduates, mid-career alumni, and senior alumni, to capture both short-term and long-term perspectives. The findings show that alumni consistently value the program's strengths in conceptual thinking, research, critical inquiry, communication, and adaptability. At the same time, they identified recurring gaps in real-world workflow, technical execution, business and industry understanding, teamwork under pressure, and readiness for emerging tools and AI-related work contexts. Overall, alumni feedback provided a clear picture of what the program is doing well, what needs strengthening, and which areas should be developed further in the revised curriculum.

After gathering all the information above, key stakeholder requirements can be summarized as shown in Tab

2.1.2) External Environment Analysis

The external environment analysis was conducted to examine the broader conditions influencing the revision of the Communication Design Program. It draws on information from industry stakeholders, alumni, graduate users, and comparative observations of the contemporary design and communication landscape. These inputs were synthesized to identify recurring needs, changing expectations, emerging opportunities, and external factors relevant to the future direction of the program. This analysis serves as the basis for the following discussion on labor market demand and supply, competitor and benchmark considerations, and other external factors affecting the program revision.

2.1.2.1) Analysis of Demand and Supply in Labor Market (Both Quantitative Data)

Quantitative Analysis

The quantitative demand–supply signals relevant to Communication Design indicate that the labor market continues to concentrate on visual communication production and creative content work, with stable demand for foundational capabilities such as graphic design practice, visual composition, brand/identity-related output, and professional execution using common creative production tools. Across the mapped sub-domains, the demand profile is not limited to a single medium: it spreads across visual arts and craft-related practice, marketing/advertising communication work, and moving-image/media production, suggesting that employers value designers who can translate concepts into outputs across different formats and channels.

This cross-domain pattern implies that market demand is anchored in a stable “core” of visual communication production, while the surrounding opportunities extend into adjacent creative sectors where communication outputs are continuously required. Overall, the quantitative evidence supports a graduate profile that is strong in concept-to-execution capability and multi-format production adaptability, rather than a narrow specialization in one output type.

Qualitative Analysis

Qualitative evidence from our stakeholder survey and senior alumni reflections helps interpret what the quantitative market signals mean in practice for graduate readiness. Stakeholders consistently emphasize that graduates should not be trained as task executors only; they expect purposeful creativity supported by professional communication (brief alignment, cross-functional collaboration, and mature handling of feedback/iteration) and workflow ownership (responsibility, time management, and reliable follow-through in production processes). They also highlight the importance of context awareness—understanding client and business realities—while maintaining credibility and ethical judgment as tools and working expectations continue to evolve.

Senior alumni add a long-range perspective that clarifies what should be protected as the program adapts to changing professional conditions. They repeatedly stress that communication design program should remain grounded in conceptualization, process, research, experimentation, and critical thinking, and should not be reduced to polished outcomes or trend-driven formulas. This reinforces that the program’s supply-side response to market demand should maintain strong intellectual and human-centered foundations while supporting multi-disciplinary practice across media.

2.1.2.2) Competitive Benchmarking Analysis

A competitive benchmarking analysis was undertaken to examine the position of the revised KMUTT Communication Design program in relation to comparable programs in Thailand. The comparison focused on selected Communication Design and closely related programs, especially international and English-language offerings, together with domestic programs that compete for similar student markets and career pathways. The analysis reviewed publicly available program and curriculum information to compare degree format, language, credits, internship or cooperative education, tuition, and academic focus.

The purpose of this analysis was to clarify similarities and differences between KMUTT and other benchmarked programs, and to identify the program's competitive position in terms of curriculum breadth, professional preparation, and overall program value. These findings provide the basis for the discussion of the program's strength and competitive edge in the next section.

Communication Design Program at Chulalongkorn University was selected as a key benchmark because of its strong visibility and reputation in the field of Communication Design, particularly among students seeking an international design education. MUIC was selected as an important comparator due to its established international curriculum and studio-based approach within a liberal arts environment. SUIC's Digital Communication Design program was included because of its clear international positioning, double-degree structure, and strong emphasis on digital communication and media-related pathways. Bangkok University was represented by two programs because both compete for overlapping student groups, but through somewhat different positions: the Thai Communication Design program serves as a direct domestic comparator, while the Creative Communication Design International Program reflects a more explicitly international, market-facing, and agency-oriented model.

The findings suggest that the competitive field in Thailand is not defined by a single model of Communication Design education, but by several overlapping approaches. Some programs are more strongly identified with traditional communication design and graphic-based foundations, some emphasize international studio practice and small-class learning, while others are positioned around digital communication, moving image, or market-facing creative production. In this context, the KMUTT program is especially significant because it appears to occupy a broader and more integrated position, connecting visual communication, typography, motion, web and digital media, content creation, research, and professional preparation within one curriculum framework. This gives the program a distinctive place within the Thai landscape and provides important direction for its strategic positioning and curriculum development in the revised program.

2.1.2.3) Other External Factors to be Considered (If any)

1) AI-assisted production and platform accessibility

A major external factor affecting the program is the rapid restructuring of creative work through AI-assisted production and increasingly accessible design platforms. In many areas of communication design, routine output such as mood images, layout variations, presentation visuals, simple social media content, and early-stage ideation can now be produced faster and at lower cost than before. This does not eliminate the need for designers, but it shifts where value is created. More defensible value increasingly lies in framing the problem, making critical judgments, building coherent concepts, directing systems across media, and producing work with stronger cultural, strategic, or experiential depth. For the program, this means it is no longer sufficient to prepare students only as software users or visual stylists; graduates must be able to demonstrate why their thinking—not only their making—is worth hiring.

2) Hybridization of roles and cross-media expectations

Another important factor is the growing hybridization of roles in the communication design ecosystem. Boundaries between graphic design, content creation, motion, branding, UX-related thinking, creative strategy, and digital communication have become increasingly blurred. In practice, a graduate may be asked to design a visual identity, adapt it into short-form video content, prepare client-facing presentation materials, and understand how work performs across platforms. This is especially visible in smaller studios, startups, brand teams, and cross-functional environments, where employers often prefer designers who can move across formats rather than operate within a narrow single-medium role. This trend creates an opportunity for the program, but it also requires clearer curricular bridges between media, workflows, and professional application.

3) Compressed timelines and production expectations

The external environment also shows a compression of professional timelines and expectations. Faster turnaround has become normal, especially in digital and campaign-based work. Entry-level designers are expected to contribute quickly to real projects, handle feedback efficiently, and work within production constraints rather than only pursue open-ended exploration. Students still need room for experimentation, but they also need structured experience dealing with scope, deadlines, revisions, collaboration, and decision-making under realistic conditions.

4) Expanding social, cultural, and ethical terrain

A further factor is the expansion of communication design into broader social, cultural, and ethical terrain. Designers are increasingly expected to respond to sustainability, inclusivity, cultural sensitivity, and the social consequences of media. In the Thai and regional context, this includes working with local cultural material without reducing it to surface aesthetics, and communicating with awareness of diverse communities and audiences. This raises the importance of research, interpretation, and ethical judgment, positioning communication design not only as content production but as shaping meaning, perception, and public-facing narratives.

5) Competitive and educational benchmarking pressure

Finally, the program must consider the broader competitive and educational context. Students are increasingly benchmarked against peers from adjacent fields and institutions with different strengths, such as stronger production pipelines, branding polish, software readiness, or industry exposure. In this environment, the program's distinctiveness cannot rely only on being broad or creative in a general sense. It must articulate more clearly what kind of communication designer it aims to develop, and how that graduate remains relevant in a market where tools are cheaper, workflows are faster, and employers are more selective about immediately usable capability.

Concluding implication

Taken together, these external conditions suggest that the challenge ahead is not simply to update course content, but to reposition the educational value of communication design: from producing outputs toward preparing graduates to think critically, work across media, adapt to changing production systems, and create communication value that cannot be replaced by speed, templates, or automation.

2.1.3) Internal Environment Analysis

2.1.3.1) Performance Appraisal

The Communication Design program has maintained an admission target of 40 students per academic year, receiving approximately 60–80 applications annually. Although around 80 percent of applicants typically meet the admission criteria, the number of students who ultimately enroll has varied between 24 and 47 students per cohort. These fluctuations may be associated with several factors, including increasing competition among communication design and related creative programs, tuition costs, campus location, applicants' enrollment decisions, and the need for clearer communication of the program's identity and learning outcomes.

Table 1 Number of students in the program from the academic year 2020-2025

Degree Title and Field of Study:

Student Admission Plan: (In case of several admission plans, specify in remark)
Student ID	First-time Student (pers.)	Dropout (pers.)	Left Behind (pers.)	Graduate (pers.)	Average Time to Graduate (year)
Code 63	35	6	-	29	4.22
Code 64	47	14	-	33	4.03
Code 65	24	4	5*	17	4.00
Code 66	35	5	-	-	-
Code 67	29	6	-	-	-
Code 68	30	4	-	-	-

Remark: The data shown in the table (Row) represents the number of students in the same cohort.

Student performance data indicate that the number of students withdrawing from the program has remained relatively consistent across most cohorts, generally ranging from four to six students, with cohort 64 representing an exception with a higher withdrawal rate. Most attrition occurs after the first year of study, during the transition from foundation studies to intensive studio-based and project-based learning. The primary contributing factors include academic performance below the program requirements, difficulties in adapting to the studio learning environment, challenges in workload and time management, and personal or health-related circumstances. Some students also transferred to other academic programs after identifying different educational or career interests. For cohort 64, the higher withdrawal rate was further influenced by the disruption caused by the COVID-19 pandemic, which affected students' learning continuity, class attendance, and adaptation to studio-based education.

For students who continue in the program, academic progression has remained satisfactory. The average time to graduation for completed cohorts ranges from 4.00 to 4.22 years, indicating that most students graduate within the expected duration of the program. Students requiring additional study time are primarily those who repeat prerequisite or required courses, while a small number temporarily suspend their studies due to health-related reasons. The program supports these students through academic advising, individual consultations, learning progress monitoring, and appropriate academic support throughout their studies.

Graduate outcomes also provide evidence of program performance. Employer evaluations from cooperative education consistently indicate satisfaction to high satisfaction with students' professional performance, and no students have been returned from cooperative education placements due to unsatisfactory performance. Alumni have established careers across a wide range of communication design and related creative industries and continue to contribute to the program through guest lectures, portfolio reviews, mentoring activities, and industry collaboration. These engagements strengthen the relationship between the program and the professional community while providing current students with valuable industry perspectives.

Overall, the performance appraisal indicates that the program maintains satisfactory student progression and graduation outcomes despite fluctuations in student enrollment and first-year retention. The findings from this analysis were considered during the curriculum revision process and informed improvements to curriculum sequencing, workload distribution, early-stage student support, academic advising, and the clarification of the program's educational direction and identity.....

2.1.3.2) Strengths Analysis

Based on feedback from current students, the program demonstrates several strengths that shape both the learning experience and student development.

1. Supportive learning culture: CMD is widely seen as a supportive environment that encourages creativity, experimentation, and self-discovery. Students value the opportunity to explore different media, methods, and interests while gradually identifying their own strengths and directions.
2. Strong development of thinking and concepts: The program is particularly strong in design thinking, research, concept development, and visual communication. Students noted that CMD emphasizes not only making outcomes, but also thinking systematically, analyzing problems, asking questions, and building ideas with clear reasoning.
3. Broad understanding of Communication Design: Students recognized that the curriculum presents Communication Design as a broad and contemporary field rather than a narrowly defined graphic practice. Through cross-media work, storytelling, motion, culture, and technology, the program helps students develop wider perspectives and stronger connections between design and its social, cultural, and professional contexts.
4. Diversity of lecturer expertise: Students were generally able to identify distinct areas of practice among lecturers, including typography, graphic design, illustration, motion graphics, film, printmaking, conceptual practice, and visual culture. This strengthens the identity of the program and helps students connect coursework with professional fields more clearly.

Overall, CMD's strengths lie in its supportive culture, strong emphasis on thinking and concept development, broad disciplinary perspective, and diverse lecturer expertise. Together, these qualities support not only skill development, but also the growth of students' creative identity as contemporary communication designers.

2.2.2) Strength and Competitive Edge

1) Historical strength and program maturity

The program holds a strong position from its long-standing presence in the Thai communication design landscape. Among the benchmarked programs reviewed, KMUTT can be positioned as one of the earliest, and likely the earliest in this direct comparison group, to establish an English-language or international-facing Communication Design pathway. This supports stronger curriculum maturity, disciplinary continuity, and alumni development than several later-established competitors.

2) Broad and adaptable Communication Design platform

A key strength of the program is its breadth. Rather than focusing narrowly on graphic communication, digital media production, or agency-oriented creative communication, the curriculum connects visual communication, typography, motion, web and digital media, content creation, research, and professional preparation in one structure. This gives the program an advantage in preparing graduates for design practice across platforms, formats, and communication contexts.

3) Balance between theory, research, and practice

The program is competitive not only because of studio production, but because it combines studio learning with communication theory, design and cultural analysis, research methodology, design methodology, precedent study, and legal and ethical awareness. Students are therefore prepared not only to produce outcomes, but also to frame problems, justify decisions, and connect design practice to wider social and cultural contexts. This balance is a clear point of distinction from programs that lean more heavily toward production alone.

4) Professional readiness and work-integrated learning

Another competitive edge is the program's structured preparation for professional practice. The curriculum includes cooperative study and related components that support seminar learning, professional awareness, and readiness for working environments. This strengthens the program's position by linking academic learning with professional transition while retaining a design-led identity.

5) Strong value for money

The program also appears competitive in terms of cost and value. Public fee information suggests that KMUTT offers a comparatively accessible tuition level when considered alongside total credit load and curricular breadth. Compared with several international or international-facing competitors, this makes the program attractive for students seeking both quality and affordability.

6) Diverse alumni pathways

The alumni profile is another important strength. Graduates appear across multiple parts of the creative economy rather than a single niche, including fashion and product-related practice, visual and experiential design, music and media-related work, independent studios, teaching, and entrepreneurship. This suggests that the program supports flexible career development and long-term relevance. Alumni visibility could become an even stronger competitive asset if more actively promoted.

Overall competitive position

Taken together, the program's competitive advantage lies in its historical credibility, broad curriculum structure, balanced integration of theory and practice, professional preparation, value for money, and diverse alumni outcomes. These qualities position the program not simply as another design degree, but as a mature, broad, and professionally connected Communication Design program with strong adaptability for contemporary and future creative industries.

2.3) Details of the Program Design

The overall product concept of the program (in topic 2.2) evolved into the details of the program, which are:

2.3.1) Determination of Program Learning Outcomes (PLOs)

2.3.1.1) Philosophy, Importance and Objectives of the Program

2.3.1.1.1) Program Philosophy

The Communication Design Program positions communication design as a creative, critical, and technological practice that transforms ideas, contexts, and human experiences into meaningful visual and media communication.

The program fosters design excellence through research-based inquiry, visual thinking, experimentation, and studio-based practice. It integrates multidisciplinary knowledge, emerging technologies, innovation, and design thinking with foundations in psychology, semiotics, communication theory, visual culture, and media studies.

Grounded in practice-based and student-centered learning, the program cultivates students' creative identity, professional responsibility, and capacity for lifelong learning. Graduates are expected to engage with local and global contexts, respond to real-world conditions, and contribute to contemporary cultural production through ethical, human-centered, and future-oriented communication design practice.

2.3.1.1.2) Importance of the Program

The Communication Design Program is important in responding to the growing demand for creative professionals who can communicate complex ideas across visual communication, contemporary art and design practices, craft-based and digital media, moving image, sound, interaction, branding, publication, and emerging creative technologies. As communication today is shaped by social, economic, cultural, technological, and media conditions, designers are expected to move beyond producing visual outputs and create meaningful connections between information, people, culture, and society.

Market and stakeholder feedback indicate that contemporary design practice requires graduates who are technically capable, conceptually strong, adaptable, research-oriented, and professionally responsible. The program therefore prepares students to understand contexts, interpret audiences, frame communication problems, work across media and teams, and use emerging technologies, including AI-assisted tools, with critical judgment and ethical awareness.

By connecting design thinking, visual and sound aesthetics, research, experimentation, professional practice, and human-centered communication, the program supports creative industries, contemporary cultural production, and KMUTT's direction in integrated innovation, lifelong learning, and sustainable social impact.

2.3.1.1.3) Program Objectives

1. To shape graduates who can make sense of contemporary communication contexts and translate them into thoughtful design outcomes.

The program aims to enable students to read social, cultural, technological, and human conditions, develop research-informed ideas, and transform them into visual, media, and communication design works with conceptual clarity and aesthetic quality.

2. To build graduates who can move confidently across tools, media, and creative production systems.

The program aims to strengthen students' ability to work with traditional, digital, emerging, and AI-assisted technologies in ways that go beyond basic tool operation. Students are expected to connect design thinking, experimentation, visual and sound sensibility, and professional execution across different forms of contemporary design practice.

3. To prepare graduates who can participate responsibly in creative industries and cultural production.

The program aims to support students in becoming reflective, collaborative, and ethically aware designers who can communicate their work professionally, respond to local and international contexts, and contribute meaningful design practices to people, communities, industries, and society.

C. Free Elective Not more than6 หน่วยกิต

Learners can choose any courses offered at King Mongkut's University of Technology Thonburi.

D) Components Relating to Fieldwork Experience (specified) e.g. internship/ CWIE/Cooperate Education /Work Practice/WIL/others. For each category, the following topics must be specified:

D.1) Learning outcomes of field experience

CMD 453 Cooperative Study

Upon completion, students will be able to:

- Apply professional communication design processes in real working environments.
- Develop and demonstrate individual design competencies through professional outcomes.
- Collaborate effectively as part of a multidisciplinary team

D.2) Duration

Cooperative Study: 4 months (June–September), minimum 12 weeks or 640 working hours.

D.3) Number of Credits

CMD 453 Cooperative Study: 6 credits

D.4) Preparation

Preparation begins in Year 3, Semester 1 through CMD 351 Precedent Study, where students explore professional pathways and field experience expectations. In Year 3, Semester 2 (CMD 352 Professional Legal and Ethical Issues), students identify prospective organizations, justify their selection, and prepare documentation required for placement. Prior to placement, students receive guidance on reporting systems, evaluation criteria, and professional conduct standards through COOP dedicated explanation session.

D.5) Learning Management

The assessment of Cooperative Study consists of two main components:

1) Industry Supervisor Evaluation

Students are evaluated by the assigned workplace supervisor through the School's online cooperative education system. Evaluations are conducted twice during the placement and once upon completion. Students are required to complete a minimum of 640 working hours (or 12 weeks). The evaluation covers three key criteria: Work Achievement, Responsibility, Personality.

2) Academic Advisor Evaluation

The faculty advisor evaluates student performance based on the following components:

2.1 Work Plan Review

Assessment of the student's work plan developed in collaboration with the workplace supervisor, including verification of weekly progress against the agreed plan.

2.2 Weekly Progress Reports

Students submit weekly reports through the Faculty's online cooperative system. These reports document task progress, learning outcomes, challenges encountered, and other relevant professional experiences.

2.3 Final Presentation and Poster

Students present their cooperative study outcomes and professional learning experiences through a formal presentation and poster, demonstrating reflection and integration of acquired competencies.

D.6) Assessment Process

The evaluation is divided into three main parts:

1. Assessment by the company or supervisor, instructor, and student (accounting for 70%–80% of the total grade);
2. Evaluation of the weekly reports and final plate presented by the student, either online or onsite (accounting for 10%–15%);

3. Assessment of the overall student presentation, which should demonstrate the student's understanding and experience gained during the internship (accounting for 10%–15%).

D.7) List of cooperative field experience (if any)

- Bit Egg Inc.
- Cuscus The Cuckoo
- Ductstore the Design Guru Company
- Shake & Bake Studio Co., Ltd
- The Uni_form Design Studio
- Yimsamer Studio Co.,Ltd.
- Yupp Entertainment Co.,Ltd.

e) Specifications related to the Project or Research (if any)

e.1) Learning outcomes of projects or research

The continuous thesis courses (CMD 401,402) serve as an opportunity for students to create a final project that contributes to and situates itself within the breadth of the professional communication design field. Utilizing both the technical and theoretical skills acquired throughout their previous three years of study, these final two semesters guide students to create a project that connects their personal interests, concerns, and skillsets while working toward individual and professional goals. The thesis project encourages students to situate their work within a broader cultural, social, technological, and historical framework for a greater understanding of the scope of the communication design field and the possibilities of current and future engagement. The thesis project additionally builds upon professional skill sets acquired during their internship and allows students to practice and utilize productive working strategies and continue to develop professional practices. Successful completion of the thesis courses will require students to propose a topic of inquiry for approval based on primary and secondary research, engage in panel reviews and critique sessions with the full CMD faculty and peers, and participate in one on one mentorship sessions. The final outcome will result in the production of a creative project, a public exhibition including engagement with an appropriate audience, and a written theoretical reflection and final review by the CMD faculty.

e.2) Duration

Semester 1–2 of the fourth academic year

e.3) Number of Credits

12 Credits

e.4) Preparation

To best prepare, serve, and support students during their thesis project they are first given a contemporary and relevant selection of readings to complete before the start of CMD 401. Students are given prompts and questions in relation to the readings and are expected to respond visually and in writing in public blogs to invite interaction among peers. Using these sources and inquiries as a starting point students are then guided through a series of weekly small group brainstorming and mentorship sessions, studio-based challenges and workshops, and guided discussions to aid them in articulating areas of interest that have further inquiry based possibilities. Students continue to present their weekly interrogations in public blogs. The first semester culminates in a written statement that includes research and reflection and a presentation of the work and proposal in the format of an audiovisual presentation to the instructors for approval to join CMD 402.

The final Audio-Visual presentation is used as an aid for the CMD faculty to best evaluate the students' needs for the remainder of the thesis project. Students are then paired with a CMD faculty advisor that is best suited to aid in the individual's primary and secondary research and to guide them throughout the building of a professional and engaging project. Advisors work closely with students on technical, theoretical and professional components of the project. While students are paired with an individual advisor, they are also encouraged to seek specific help and feedback from the entire CMD team and the broader communication design community.

e.5) Learning Management

Students are evaluated and graded throughout both CMD 401/402 to ensure growth and maintain academic standards.

CMD 401 grading criteria is as follows:

Blog/Creative journal: 50%

Students are evaluated on the consistency, depth, and breadth of their primary and secondary research. Weekly blog/creative journal assignments are given as starting points for exploration and investigation. Students are expected to provide evidence of extensive visual research that demonstrates risk, experimentation, and imagination. Students are expected to show evidence of identification and review of relevant issues, concepts, and theories at a high level. Students are expected to utilize appropriate copyright permissions and accurate citations with clear and competent writing.

Participation: 20%

Students are evaluated on their attendance and contribution to weekly classroom workshops, discussions, and feedback sessions.

Final AV/Statement of intent: 30%

At the end of CMD 401 students submit a 3-minute audio-visual presentation and accompanying statement of intent. These two documents serve as proof of the development of studio-based research and conceptual understanding of their topic of research. Students are evaluated on the visual, material, and conceptual research proving multiple creative experiments that are mutually reinforcing. Students are evaluated on the identification and review of relevant issues and concepts and the sophistication of their use of sources as they relate to their topic of interest.

CMD 402 grading criteria as follows:

Open Studios: = 30%

Open studio sessions are a time for students to present their action research plans, progress, and visual and conceptual research to the CMD panel of instructors. Students are evaluated on their preparedness, progress, and professionalism. Expectations of progress increase throughout the semester.

Research framework statement: 10%

Students must write a research framework early in the semester (by week 3) clearly defining their WHAT (topic), WHY (interest), and WHY it matters now. The final submission will be a short, focused essay explaining their position, theoretical grounding, and key arguments. The essay should build on prior research (CMD401), develop a clear thesis statement, form original connections, and present a strong, convincing position that shows understanding, care, and intellectual engagement with the topic.

Final journal evaluation: 30%

A final journal (physical and digital) is submitted that demonstrates both students' project development and the final project outcome. Attention to images, presentation, and proficiency in design is expected. The journal presents their methodology and final statement of conceptual framework adhering to academic writing standards. Students will archive, document, and reflect on their project in a final original journal of reflective writing and images that utilize theoretical and professional sources and simultaneously acts as evidence of design work.

Final project evaluation: 30%

The final project is evaluated based on the professional execution, presentation, and engagement with a defined public audience.

e.6) Assessment Process

The assessment process for the thesis/project is designed as a continuous process across CMD 401 Communication Design Project Preparation and CMD 402 Communication Design Project. In CMD 401, students develop a thesis topic, research direction, conceptual position, and initial visual inquiry through a written thesis statement, audio/visual presentation, and creative journal. This stage verifies the readiness of students to proceed to CMD 402 by assessing the clarity of their research question, purpose, design approach, visual thinking, and evidence of creative and theoretical exploration.

In CMD 402, students continue from the approved thesis statement and research framework developed in CMD 401 and transform it into a final self-directed Communication Design project. Assessment is conducted through staged submissions and checkpoints, including the research framework statement, Open Studio 1, Open Studio 2 / half-way assessment, final audio/visual presentation and final outcome, and creative journal. The assessment process combines formative feedback through advisor meetings, peer sessions, and open studio reviews with summative assessment based on clearly defined criteria and rubrics.

The mechanism for standard verification is embedded through the use of shared rubrics, multiple assessment points, advisor and peer review, and evidence-based documentation. Rubrics are aligned with the course learning outcomes and used by academic staff, peers, and students to support consistent expectations and assessment validity. The final outcome and audio/visual presentation are assessed by two advisors, while the creative journal provides evidence of research, experimentation, reflection, and development throughout the project. This ensures that the assessment verifies both the quality of the final Communication Design outcome and the student's ability to conduct a rigorous, reflective, and professionally appropriate design process

b) Learning Pathway

Learning Path Name: Visual Designer (Visual Storytelling and Audiovisual Design)

Learning Path Descriptions:

This learning pathway develops students' competencies in visual storytelling, concept development, and audiovisual design. Students learn to translate research and ideas into compelling visual communication through motion, narrative structures, and sound-visual relationships.

The pathway emphasizes visual mapping, narrative thinking, and the creation of time-based media that can support storytelling and audiovisual performance contexts, including music and stage-based productions. Students develop the ability to research, formulate design concepts, and transform them into coherent visual experiences.

Through this process, learners cultivate creative thinking, experimentation, and reflective practice. The pathway encourages independent exploration and supports the development of lifelong learning habits and a growth mindset within the evolving field of communication design.

c) Explain how to design the teaching and learning process that encourages learners to learn, know how to seek knowledge, cultivate learners to have lifelong learning, and develop a growth mindset.

To cultivate a visual designer with strong visual storytelling ability, conceptual thinking, and audiovisual communication skills, the learning pathway is designed to emphasize learner-centered, project-based, and exploratory learning approaches. These approaches support the development of active learning habits, independent knowledge-seeking skills, lifelong learning, and a growth mindset.

1. Encourage Active and Experiential Learning

- Implement project-based learning where students develop visual narratives and audiovisual works that communicate ideas, emotions, or stories through images, motion, and sound.
- Integrate real-world creative contexts such as visual design for music performances, digital media, and audiovisual experiences to connect conceptual thinking with professional practice.
- Provide studio-based learning environments where students experiment with visual mapping, motion systems, and narrative structures while receiving critique and feedback from instructors and peers.

2. Foster Independent Inquiry and Knowledge-Seeking Skills

- Encourage research-driven design processes where students investigate references, cultural contexts, and visual languages to develop strong creative concepts.
- Guide students in exploring digital tools, visual media technologies, and emerging creative platforms to expand their design capabilities.
- Promote peer learning and collaborative discussions where students exchange ideas, critique works, and refine their visual thinking.

3. Cultivate Lifelong Learning Habits

- Integrate reflective learning practices such as project documentation, design journals, and digital portfolios that allow students to evaluate their development over time.
- Encourage students to explore interdisciplinary influences including music, media arts, performance, and digital culture to broaden their creative perspectives.
- Support participation in creative communities, exhibitions, and online platforms to expose students to evolving design practices.

4. Develop a Growth Mindset

- Incorporate open-ended design challenges where students experiment with multiple visual approaches and learn through iteration and feedback.
- Emphasize critique sessions and reflective discussions where students analyze their creative decisions, identify areas for improvement, and adapt their design strategies.

The program tracks learner progress through continuous assessment embedded within studio, theory, and project-based courses. Progress is monitored through assignments, critiques, presentations, project reviews, portfolios, and advisor discussions at key stages of learning. These activities allow instructors to identify strengths, challenges, and areas requiring further development.

When learners do not achieve the expected learning outcomes, instructors provide additional feedback, consultation, and opportunities for revision or further development. Support may include one-on-one advising, supplementary learning activities, extended project refinement, or repeating the course where necessary. The goal is to help learners achieve the required outcomes while supporting their individual learning needs.

d) Graduation criteria

- In accordance with the Notification of the Higher Education Standards Committee on Standards for Bachelor's Programs B.E. 2565 (2022) and in accordance with the Regulations of King Mongkut's University of Technology Thonburi. Regarding Undergraduate Education B.E. 2557 (2014) or other amended regulations
- In accordance with Announcement of King Mongkut's University of Technology Thonburi English Language Development Policy for Bachelor's Degree Students (No. 2), Year 2025

2.3.4) Design Concept for Learning Supports

2.3.4.1) Analysis of competency and readiness of academic staff and supporting staff

The program recruits faculty members whose qualifications meet the standards set by the Ministry of Higher Education, Science, Research and Innovation (MHESI). Beyond this requirement, the program places emphasis on aligning teaching responsibilities with each instructor's knowledge base, areas of expertise, research approaches, and experience in academic services. This alignment supports effective teaching and allows students to meaningfully connect theoretical knowledge with communication design practice and project-based learning.

KMUTT regularly provides training for faculty members to strengthen their understanding of teaching and learning methods, learning activity design, and assessment practices, in line with the KMUTT Professional Standards Framework (PSF). The university also encourages close and consistent interaction between instructors and students to support learning quality. At the school level, an instructor-to-student ratio of 1:15 is applied as a practical guideline for workload management and academic personnel planning, in accordance with the university's criteria.

2.3.4.2) Guidelines for the development of academic staff and supporting staff

New instructors join the university's Onboarding Program to gain a clear understanding of the university's policies, philosophy, and objectives, alongside those of the faculty and the Communication Design curriculum. To support effective onboarding, experienced instructors are appointed as mentors, and new or adjunct instructors co-teach with senior faculty members. This ensures they understand the curriculum structure, how courses connect across the learning pathway, and the role of each course they are responsible for.

The program encourages new instructors to continuously strengthen their disciplinary knowledge, teaching practice, and research capability in areas relevant to Communication Design. Research teams led by experienced faculty members are established to support collaborative academic work and provide initial funding for instructors who have not yet received research grants. This enables them to initiate projects aligned with their interests and further develop these into full research proposals. In addition, instructors are encouraged to seek external research funding. Beyond research projects, the program also recognizes and supports other forms of academic and creative output, such as solo art and design exhibitions, joint projects in media production connected to research initiatives, and academic–creative collaborations with other research projects. It also encourages instructors to initiate activities with students and external partners, including workshops, showcases, and public-facing engagements.

The program also supports academic staff in pursuing further education, joining professional development and training, participating in academic and industry visits, and presenting at conferences at both national and international levels. Faculty members are further encouraged to take academic leave to deepen their knowledge and professional experience, in alignment with the philosophy and objectives of the university, the faculty, and the Communication Design curriculum.

2.3.4.3) Facilities & Infrastructure and Student support services

The main educational facility of the School of Architecture and Design at King Mongkut's University of Technology Thonburi (KMUTT) is an eight-story, 19,700-square-meter building. Five undergraduate programs operate primarily at the Bang Khun Thian campus: Architecture, Interior Architecture, Design Innovation, Communication Design, and Landscape Architecture. In addition, the school rents part of the Knowledge Exchange (KX) building to host the Master's and Doctoral Programs in Design and Planning. There is also a space at Bangmod for the Multiple Intelligences for Design Integration Program, which collaborates with FIBO and GMI. Since traveling to Bang Khun Thian is currently inconvenient and the university's shuttle services cannot fully meet student demand, additional space is rented at the KX building for programs requiring collaboration with external businesses and for those targeting working professionals with classes held outside regular hours.

The management of the School of Architecture and Design building involves the appointment of a Facility Management Committee responsible for planning and overseeing the efficient use of building resources to ensure readiness and responsiveness. This approach maximizes the benefits for all building users. An annual budget is also allocated for the continuous development and modernization of support facilities to promote integrated learning.

The school provides the necessary equipment and facilities to support teaching and learning processes in response to the increasingly digital nature of education. This includes LCD TVs and other essential devices available for borrowing by students and faculty members. The school also houses several laboratories, such as the Urban Lab, Lighting Lab, Human-Centered Design Lab, Lighting Dome, and Wood Workshop. In addition, new technologies have been introduced under the Fabrication Lab, including Laser Cutters, 3D Printers, Concrete Printers, Robot Arms, Cobots, and Eye-Tracking systems, which serve as valuable tools for both design and research.

In addition to physical facilities and laboratories, the school provides essential design software such as the Adobe Creative Suite for all students. There are also plans to procure additional software tools necessary for practical training and future professional practice.

2.3.5) Program Development Mechanism for Quality Assurance

2.3.5.1) Quality Management Issues

2.3.5.1(a) Educational Standard Criteria

The curriculum complies with the 2022 undergraduate program standards and the regulations of King Mongkut's University of Technology Thonburi regarding undergraduate education.

The school appoints responsible personnel to oversee the curriculum and ensure compliance with Component 1 (Curriculum Standards) of the Office of the Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Higher Education, Science, Research and Innovation (MHESI). These personnel report to the responsible program lecturer, the faculty quality assurance committee, and the school committee on a regular basis. The program also records Component 1 information in the CHE QA Online system at the end of each academic year and reports the approved evaluation results to the university-level working group and MHESI accordingly. To ensure quality beyond Component 1, the program also implements additional internal mechanisms to monitor and improve curriculum implementation.

Process	Educational Standard Criteria For consumer protection, every program must comply with Educational Curriculum Standards (Component 1) of the Office of the Permanent Secretary, Ministry of Higher Education, Science, Research and Innovation (OPS MHESI) and every program must record information on component 1 in the Commission on Higher Education Quality Assessment online system (CHE QA online) every year. Therefore, the program will set up instructors and supporting staff as a working committee to supervise, monitor, and assess various operations of the program in accordance with the curriculum standards. This must be completed before the start of the semester. In addition, there will be an assessment by the faculty level committee at the end of the academic year on an annual basis and the results of the assessment which has been approved by the Faculty Committee will be reported to the university level and OPS MHESI, respectively. Recommendations from every level will be used as input to improve the program next round.
Control Points	- Compliance with curriculum standards

Person in charge	- Responsible program lecturers - Quality assurance supporting staff
Time period	At the end of semester
Inspectors	- Quality assurance committee at the faculty level - School Committee - Associate Dean for Academic Affairs and Quality assurance
Monitoring and Evaluation process/procedures	The person in charge of the curriculum is required to work together with the Associate Dean for Academic Affairs and Quality Assurance to verify the accuracy of course data and lecturer information in the course, and evaluates the results of notifications and academic performance tracking, and finds ways to improve the implementation in the next year.

2.3.5.1.(b) Students

The program supports students from the point of entry, providing preparation and continuous support throughout their studies as follows:

1. Input Standard Control

Through the student admission process, minimum English proficiency requirements are set: TOEFL (iBT) = 61, IELTS = 5, CU-TEP = 61, RMIT = Upper Intermediate (5), TOEIC = 605 or CEFR 51: B2. Students must also pass a design aptitude test, submit a portfolio, and attend an interview. If a student's English score is below the standard— ELTS – 4.5, TOEFL (iBT) – 53-60, CU-TEP –53-60, RMIT = Intermediate (4.5), TOEIC=540-604 or CEFR 41-50: B1—but passes the selection process, they are required to complete a 120-hour Intensive English Course before the semester begins.

2. Pre-Study Preparation

This includes preparation in both English proficiency and design skills. For students who wish to strengthen their foundational design skills, the program offers training in observation, communication, material knowledge, and 3D model making, among others, to support creative thinking and essential design abilities.

3. Participation in International Exposure

Students are encouraged to engage in activities that involve working or learning in international environments, such as exchange programs and student activities. These experiences aim to develop academic, professional, and soft skills alongside the formal curriculum.

4. Mental Health Support

Mental well-being is supported through regular conversations with students when issues are observed. This is carried out by academic advisors, course instructors, student affairs officers, academic staff, KMUTT psychologists, and external psychologists. Reports are submitted to the program chair every semester.

Student Activities and Support

Process	The school provides activities to develop their skills and channel for student to communicate as following steps: 1. Offer Intensive English and Design Preparation Courses Invite newly admitted students to register for these courses based on their interests in April, with classes scheduled for June and July. 2. Organize an Orientation Program Introduce students to the school's facilities, available support services, and provide academic guidance to help them navigate their studies effectively. 3. Provide Extracurricular Activities and Student Support Encourage students to participate in additional activities and offer support when they face academic or personal challenges. 4. Conduct an End-of-Year Student Survey Collect feedback from students at the end of each academic year and arrange meetings between students and school executives to gather their needs and suggestions.
Control Points	● Students regularly attend classes and participate in activities. They are able to manage their time effectively between academic coursework and extracurricular activities. ● Students have access to communication channels to relieve stress and are able to attend classes as scheduled.
Person in charge	Faculty member and staff
Time period	Academic Year: June - May
Inspectors	Program Committee

Monitoring and Evaluation process/procedures	1. The Program Chairperson monitors academic performance and student status by regularly following up with academic advisors. Any issues identified are discussed collaboratively to find appropriate solutions. 2. The Program Chairperson reports academic outcomes each semester to the School Committee for review and further action if necessary.

2.3.5.1.(c) Graduates

The program has a process for monitoring academic performance and credit accumulation through the NewACIS system, allowing continuous tracking of student status until graduation. The process includes the following steps:

1. Assessment of Program Learning Outcomes (PLOs)

This is done through the evaluation of students' thesis design projects and portfolios by the program chairperson and the school committee.

2. Verification of Registered Credits

Ensuring that students have registered the required number of credits according to the curriculum blueprint. The list of graduating students is submitted to the program chairperson and the school committee for acknowledgment and then forwarded to the Registrar's Office.

3. Graduate Satisfaction and Feedback Assessment

Conducted through surveys or focus groups by program faculty and staff to gather opinions on the quality of teaching and learning. The results are reported to the program chairperson.

4. Graduate Employment Status Assessment

Employment data is collected via surveys, first during the graduation ceremony and then followed up every three months through online surveys. The program sets a standard that at least 80% of graduates should be employed within one year. This is monitored by program staff and faculty.

5. Employer Satisfaction Survey

Conducted annually in July to assess employer satisfaction with the quality of graduates. The program chairperson reports the feedback to the school committee for use in curriculum improvement.

6. Tracking Career Progression of Graduates

Annual surveys are conducted by program faculty and staff to monitor graduates' career development. The findings are reported to the program chairperson and the school committee.

Student Monitoring and Graduate Tracking

Process	The faculty has a process for verifying graduation eligibility and conducting periodic follow-ups with graduates, following these steps: 1. Advisors monitor student registration and academic performance each semester to ensure students are on track to graduate according to their study plan. 2. Instructors and staff monitor graduate employment and gather feedback from employers to support ongoing program development and improvement.
Control Points	● Students register according to their study plan and maintain regular academic standing each semester. ● Employment status of graduates with the needs of the program's stakeholders
Person in charge	Program lecturers and advisors
Time period	Academic Year: August - July
Inspectors	Responsible Program Lecturers/ School Committee
Monitoring and Evaluation process/procedures	1. The Program Chairperson monitors academic performance and student status by regularly following up with academic advisors. Any issues identified are discussed collaboratively to find appropriate solutions to ensure students are on track to graduate according to their study plan. 2. The Program Chairperson reports the result of graduation and feedback from graduates and employers to the School Committee for review and further action if necessary.

2.3.5.1.(d) Program, Teaching and Learning, Learner Assessment

The school will inform each academic program to plan the course offerings for each semester. After teaching responsibilities have been assigned to instructors, they will be required to submit their course syllabus before the semester begins.

The staff responsible for teaching equipment and classroom facilities will inspect and ensure the readiness of the equipment and classrooms.

During the semester, instructors will monitor students in class. If any irregularities in student behavior are observed, the instructor will report the issue to the academic advisor, the program chair, and the relevant staff for further follow-up and support.

Teaching and Learning Management and Monitoring & Evaluation

Process	The program has a structured process for managing education and monitoring student learning outcomes as follows: 1. Curriculum Planning: The program schedules course offerings in alignment with the academic study plan for each semester. 2. Course Planning: Course instructors prepare teaching plans, assessment methods, and evaluation criteria to ensure alignment with the intended course learning outcomes. 3. Ongoing Academic Monitoring: Student progress is monitored by instructors throughout the semester. 4. Course-Level Learning Outcome Assessment: Course instructors assess learning outcomes at the end of each semester and report the results to the program chairperson. 5. Annual Program-Level Learning Outcome Assessment: Learning outcomes are evaluated annually using rubrics defined in the curriculum blueprint. This is conducted by year coordinators in collaboration with course instructors, and the results are reported to the program chairperson at the end of each academic year.
Control Points	● Students make continuous academic progress according to the study plan. ● Students successfully complete each course and achieve the intended course learning outcomes.

2.3.5.1.(e) Instructors

The recruitment, selection, development, and evaluation of faculty members are processes jointly conducted by the school and the university. These processes must follow established procedures and regulations. Instructors are required to possess academic and professional competencies as specified by the curriculum, and must undergo professional development in accordance with the KMUTT Professional Standards Framework (PSF)

Instructors Recruitment and Development

Process	The school has instructor's recruitment and development processes as follows: 1. Announce and recruit qualified instructors with English language proficiency who meet the curriculum's standard criteria. 2. Provide training for faculty members to enhance their understanding of teaching methods, learning activity design, assessment and evaluation in accordance with KMUTT PSF, and to ensure effective interaction between instructors and students. 3. Assign teaching responsibilities that align with the instructors' expertise, research direction, and academic service experience, so that students can integrate theoretical knowledge into design work. 4. Encourage faculty members to develop their teaching skills, research capabilities, and academic service contributions. 5. Monitor and evaluate teaching effectiveness based on student outcomes.
Control Points	● Students achieve course learning outcomes. ● Teaching evaluation result is not lower 3.51.

2.3.5.1.(f) Learning facilities and infrastructure

The school provides learning facilities to support students' academic and creative development. It offers access to modern tools and technologies integrated into classroom instruction, as well as dedicated spaces for design work and exhibitions. The facilities include the following:

1. Design Studios – Spacious, well-equipped environments for hands-on design practice and collaboration.

2. Exhibition Areas – Designated spaces for students to display their work, fostering a culture of critique and public presentation.

3. Fabrication Lab – Equipped with advanced tools such as 3D printers, laser cutters, CNC machines, and robotic arms to support prototyping and experimentation.

4. Computer Labs – Loaded with industry-standard software for design, modeling, and visualization.

5. Workshops – Specialized areas for woodwork, metalwork, and model-making, supervised by trained technicians.

6. Learning Commons – Flexible spaces for group work, research, and informal learning.

7. Internet Infrastructure - Recognizing the importance of internet access in education, the faculty collaborates with KMUTT's Computer Center to manage network systems. A fixed IP server is installed at the Bang Khun Thian campus to ensure fast and stable internet access. Both wired and wireless (Wi-Fi) networks are available throughout the campus. Faculty IT staff are on hand to provide technical support and maintenance

8. Software - Software is essential for effective teaching and learning. The school provides access to three main categories of software:

- Administrative and Document Tools – e.g., Microsoft Office and Office 365, available for download by all KMUTT students and staff.
- Online Learning Platforms – e.g., Microsoft Teams, Zoom, Google Meet, also provided by the university.
- Design and Modeling Software – e.g., Adobe Suite, AutoCAD, Revit, SketchUp, Rhino, Grasshopper. The faculty's IT team conducts annual surveys to assess software needs and ensure adequate licensing for instructional use.

School conducts annual satisfaction surveys among faculty members, students, and staff regarding learning support services. A Facility Management Committee is appointed to plan and manage resources to ensure readiness and responsiveness. An annual budget is allocated for the continuous development and improvement of learning support infrastructure.

Managing and Acquiring Learning Facilities and Infrastructure

Process	School proceed as the following steps: 1. Needs Assessment – Identifying what facilities and tools are required 2. Planning – Strategizing how to meet those needs. 3. Budgeting – Allocating financial resources. 4. Procurement – Acquiring the necessary equipment or services. 5. Installation – Setting up the facilities and tools. 6. 2.3.5.2) Risk Management

Risk Issues	Risk Management Plans
1) Curriculum relevance and rapid changes in design technology, AI, and professional practice	The field of communication design is rapidly affected by changes in design technology, AI-assisted workflows, media platforms, and professional practice. If the curriculum, assignments, and learning activities are not regularly updated, students may graduate with skills that do not fully respond to current industry expectations, especially in relation to emerging tools, adaptive workflows, and the changing roles of designers in professional contexts. The program will regularly review and update course content, project briefs, assignments, and learning activities based on feedback from employers, alumni, internship supervisors, professional practitioners, and current students. Flexible learning components such as special topics, elective courses, workshops, guest lectures, and practitioner-led activities will be used to ensure that students remain aware of current technologies and are able to apply them appropriately in communication design practice.
2) Student recruitment, accessibility, and perception of campus location	The program may face risks related to increased competition from design, media, and digital-related programs, as well as concerns about accessibility to Bang Khun Thian campus. The uncertainty of Rama II Road construction, commuting conditions, and the distance from central Bangkok may affect the perception of prospective students and families regarding convenience, safety, daily lifestyle, and access to professional opportunities. The program will strengthen its positioning by communicating its distinctive identity in research-based studio learning, visual communication across media, real-world projects, and professional networks. Practical information about campus access, transportation options, shuttle services, public transportation, and student life will be provided to prospective students, families, and current students. At the same time, the Bang Khun Thian context will be promoted as a distinctive learning environment for studio practice, experimentation, community engagement, and focused creative development.

3) Studio-based learning workload and student progression	Studio-based learning requires continuous project development, critique, production, and revision. If major project deadlines, critique periods, and final submissions overlap across courses, students may experience excessive workload, reduced learning depth, stress, course failure, delayed progress, or delayed graduation. This may affect both the quality of student work and the overall learning experience within the program. The program will coordinate semester planning among instructors to reduce unnecessary overlap of major deadlines and to balance workload across each semester. Year-level learning checkpoints, advisor meetings, portfolio reviews, and early-warning mechanisms will be used to monitor student progress and identify students who may need academic or personal support. These processes will help students manage project-based learning more effectively and support steady progression through the curriculum.
4) Operational capacity, staff workload, and learning support resources	The program depends on the continuous work of academic staff, support staff, facilities, equipment, software, and production resources. High workload from teaching, advising, administration, student support, events, and curriculum-related responsibilities may lead to staff burnout and reduced operational performance. In addition, insufficient or outdated facilities, equipment, and software may affect the quality of studio-based, media-based, and production-based learning. The program will review staff workload, role distribution, and operational responsibilities regularly to reduce the risk of burnout and maintain effective program operation. Common templates, shared digital systems, clearer task allocation, and support from teaching assistants, student assistants, alumni, or external practitioners may be used to reduce repetitive workload and support key activities. The program will also monitor the readiness and relevance of facilities, equipment, software, and production resources through regular checklists, maintenance planning, booking systems, and feedback from instructors and students.

2.3.5.3) Complaints and Appeals Management

Students may report or raise concerns regarding academic or administrative matters through multiple channels, including teaching evaluations, school surveys, meetings with school executives, as well as through the school's email or administrative staff. Once the school is informed, the Associate Dean for Academic Affairs and Quality Assurance coordinates with relevant personnel to review the issue, notify the person involved, and investigate the cause in order to resolve the matter appropriately.

In addition to these formal channels, the Communication Design Program maintains regular communication with students through consultations, one-on-one discussions, and small group conversations between students and program faculty members. These interactions allow students to raise concerns or difficulties they encounter during their studies and enable the program to identify and address issues at an early stage.

This process supports transparency, accountability, and continuous improvement in both academic and administrative services. Feedback from students is treated as an important input for improving teaching practices, learning environments, and curriculum implementation. The school and the program also encourage open communication and provide a supportive environment in which students can express concerns without fear of negative consequences.

2.3.5.4) Stakeholder Engagement and Communication Plan

The school disseminates information through various communication channels, including meetings, seminars, and social media platforms. News and updates on the faculty's performance are shared through the following activities:

1. Orientation and Advisor Meetings

The faculty organizes orientation sessions for new students and their parents, along with meetings between students and their academic advisors. These sessions aim to build relationships and provide guidance to help students succeed academically and develop professional skills.

2. Multi-Channel Communication

The faculty communicates with all stakeholders through various platforms, including the official website, Facebook, LINE Official Account and LINE groups, Instagram, TikTok, email, and YouTube. These channels are used to share curriculum, admission schedules, news and other important updates.

3. Student Meetings with Executives

An annual meeting is held between students and the school's executive team to understand student needs, communicate policies, provide updates on improvements, and gather feedback.

4. Faculty Meetings and Annual Seminar

Regular faculty meetings and an annual seminar are organized to communicate policies, discuss strategic plans, and exchange ideas for continuous school improvement.

5. Collaboration with External Stakeholders

The school maintains active communication and collaboration with external stakeholders, including alumni, industry partners, and academic institutions. These partnerships help align the curriculum with current trends and ensure that students are equipped with relevant skills for the job market.

6. School Visit

The school provides opportunities for students, parents, and school representatives to participate in on-campus activities and engage in discussions about the curriculum, teaching and learning processes, and various extracurricular offerings. These visits help build trust and foster a deeper understanding of the school's academic environment.

7. Personal Contact

The school provides contact information for instructors and staff in case anyone needs to reach out to them regarding any issues or inquiries. Contact information for instructors and staff is made available to ensure that students, parents, and other stakeholders can easily reach out with questions, concerns, or requests for support.

In addition to these activities and channels, all stakeholders are encouraged to exchange knowledge and stay informed by participating in various events organized both within and outside the school. Feedback and information gathered through these interactions are systematically used as input for the continuous improvement and development of the faculty and its academic programs.

Full Name: Associate Professor Dr. Shaw Hong Ser Position and/or Academic Rank: Vice Chair of Student Affairs Affiliation: International School of Communication Management (ISCM) Chulalongkorn University Type of Expert: Academic Approves the program, but has the following suggestions:
Suggestions	Program Responses
The program should further strengthen students' AI literacy for design practice, including how designers can use AI tools effectively, how AI use should be declared or referenced, and how ethical issues related to AI should be addressed. The expert also suggested that assessment methods should consider ways to evaluate students' own thinking and writing beyond the use of AI tools such as ChatGPT or Gemini.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen AI-related learning in both practical and ethical dimensions. AI will be positioned as a design-supporting tool rather than a replacement for students' conceptual thinking, research, and creative judgment. Relevant courses will include topics such as AI-assisted design workflow, declaration of AI use, authorship, references, ethical responsibility, and critical evaluation of AI-generated outcomes. The program will also review assessment methods to ensure that students' analytical thinking, writing, presentation, and decision-making processes can be clearly evaluated.
The program should reinforce communication design as storytelling, cultural production, and visual culture. Students should develop stronger skills in creative brief interpretation, project presentation, art and design theory, poster design, cultural studies, art history, creative diversity, and cultural awareness across Thai, Asian, European, and American contexts. The expert also noted that while students may have skills in image generation,	The program has considered this suggestion and will further emphasize storytelling, visual communication, cultural awareness, and project presentation across relevant courses. Creative brief analysis, communication objectives, visual culture, art and design theory, contemporary design trends, cultural context, and critical discussion will be strengthened in both studio and theory-based courses. Students will be encouraged to develop works that connect they should further improve their ability to present projects and explain design ideas clearly.	design, culture, audience, and context, while also improving their ability to communicate concepts, processes, and outcomes through professional presentations and exhibitions.

The program should consider professional relevance, entrepreneurship, program positioning, and recruitment strategy. Suggestions include supporting design entrepreneurship, helping students create their own channels or small-scale businesses, building clearer pathways or concentrations, using exhibitions from Year 2 to Year 4, increasing regional cooperation and exchange students, making use of neighboring programs and Asian/international networks, offering software training or summer courses, and strengthening active recruitment, branding, and communication of the Bang Khun Thian campus context.	The program has considered this suggestion and will continue to develop professional and entrepreneurial components within the curriculum. Relevant courses and activities will support project pitching, portfolio development, self-initiated practice, design entrepreneurship, branding, and professional pathways. The program will also consider clearer learning pathways, progressive exhibitions from earlier years toward the final project, regional collaboration, exchange opportunities, short programs, and supplementary software training where appropriate. In parallel, the program will work on communicating its identity, strengths, studio culture, and Bang Khun Thian learning environment more clearly to prospective students and stakeholders.

Suggestions	Program Responses
The curriculum should place stronger emphasis on theories of design, especially from the first year. Students should not wait until the second or third year to understand basic design theories, visual systems, color, line, form, and the reasons behind them.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen the role of design theory from the first year onward. Foundational design principles, visual systems, grid, color, line, form, and conceptual reasoning will be emphasized.

design decisions. First-year students should have more inspiration, technical experience, and in-depth theoretical foundations early so that they can build on later studio courses with stronger design thinking and a clearer creative direction.	more clearly in first-year and second-year courses. Students will be encouraged to ask critical questions such as why a color, line, form, or composition matters before focusing only on how to produce visually attractive outcomes. This will help students develop stronger foundations for later studio-based learning and professional design practice.
The curriculum should help students understand the balance between technology, art, and human-centered design. AI and software should be positioned as tools on the technology side, while art and design decisions should remain driven by human intention, sense-making, critical thinking, and embodied experience. Students should learn how to use AI properly, not as a replacement for design thinking, but as a way to support, expand, and strengthen their own creative process.	The program has considered this suggestion and will clarify the role of AI and digital technologies within the curriculum. AI will be positioned as a supporting tool for exploration, production, and workflow enhancement, while students' own judgment, cultural awareness, aesthetic sensitivity, and conceptual decision-making will remain central to art and design practice. Relevant courses will include discussion and critique on how students use AI, what they use it for, how it improves their work, and how they can maintain authorship and responsibility in the creative process.
The curriculum should be communicated through stronger visualizations rather than relying mainly on written explanations. High school students and first-year students should be able to clearly see the visual curriculum journey, not only the final output but the program should show the full process, possible pathways, and future directions so that students can imagine themselves in the field from the beginning and gradually build their own direction.	The program has considered this suggestion and will further develop visual communication of the curriculum structure, learning journey, and student pathways. The program will present not only final outcomes, but also processes, theoretical foundations, studio experiences, exhibitions, technical development, and possible professional directions across all years. This approach will help prospective students, first-year students, and stakeholders understand how the curriculum supports students from initial inspiration to mature design practice.

The curriculum should place stronger emphasis on design theories of design, especially from the first year. Students should not wait until the second or third year to understand basic design theories, visual systems, color, line, form, and the reasons behind design decisions. First-year students should be encouraged to explore inspiration, technical experience, and interdisciplinary theoretical foundations early so that they can apply these in later studio courses with stronger design thinking and clearer creative direction.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen the role of design theory from the first year onward. Foundational design principles, visual systems, grid, color, line, form, and conceptual reasoning will be emphasized more clearly in first-year and second-year courses. Students will be encouraged to ask critical questions such as why a color, line, form, or composition matters before focusing only on how to produce visually attractive outcomes. This will help students develop stronger foundations for later studio-based learning and professional design practice.

This does not mean that students lack understanding of global contexts, but it suggests that the curriculum should further support students in balancing local identity with global awareness..	descriptions, learning activities, and assessment criteria. Students will be encouraged to develop visual communication works that can respond to global contexts while maintaining meaningful connections to local culture, identity, and community.
Second-year students should have more opportunities to develop analytical skills from design briefs, as many students still interpret design briefs differently from the intended scope.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen analytical components in second-year courses, particularly through brief analysis, contextual research, problem framing, critique, and reflective discussion. These elements will be embedded in relevant studio-based courses to help students interpret design briefs more accurately and develop stronger research-informed design processes.
For third-year students, if their learning pathway is not directed toward contemporary art, the flexibility of their visual styles should be more applicable to broader professional design contexts.	The program has considered this suggestion and will support greater flexibility in third-year studio and elective courses. Students will be guided to develop individual creative directions while also considering professional applicability, audience, communication context, and industry relevance.
Packaging design should be integrated into relevant courses, as it has been observed as a common weakness among interned students, including students from SoA+D and other institutions.	The program has considered this suggestion and will integrate packaging-related design applications into appropriate studio and media courses where relevant, especially in relation to visual identity, branding, print production, material considerations, communication hierarchy, and real-world design constraints.
Business skills and entrepreneurship should be further considered as professional skills for students.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen professional relevance through learning activities related to business awareness, entrepreneurship, project proposal, pitching, client communication, professional practice, budgeting, and portfolio preparation. These components will be addressed through relevant professional practice courses and studio-based assignments.

Specific areas that should be revised or considered further include course descriptions and course learning outcomes.	The program has reviewed the course descriptions and course learning outcomes in response to the expert's suggestion. Relevant descriptions and CLOs will be refined to better reflect analytical skills, professional applicability, industry relevance, packaging-related applications, business awareness, entrepreneurship, and the balance between local and global communication contexts.

Approves the program, but has the following suggestions:

Suggestions	Program Responses
The overall revised curriculum is appropriate, particularly in terms of practical skills, elective courses, and the integration of AI as one of the tools for creative practice. However, the program should further consider how AI ethics, critical awareness, and meaningful use of AI will be taught in actual learning activities.	The program acknowledges the expert's positive evaluation and has considered this suggestion. AI-related issues will be addressed not only as technical tools, but also through discussions on ethics, authorship, creative responsibility, and the meaningful use of technology. These topics will be integrated into relevant studio, theory, and professional practice courses, particularly where students are expected to use emerging tools in the development of creative work.

The program should further support students' ability to critique, interpret, and understand art and creative work through areas such as art critique and art curation. These areas can help students develop critical judgment, understand the meaning and value of creative tools, and connect artistic practice with storytelling, exhibition-making, and cultural interpretation.	The program has considered this suggestion and will strengthen critical and reflective components in relevant courses. Art critique, visual analysis, interpretation, and contextual discussion will be embedded in studio critiques, theory-based courses, and project development processes. The program will also consider integrating curatorial thinking, exhibition narrative, and the relationship between artists, designers, audiences, and contexts into suitable courses and learning activities.
The program should further strengthen professional practice skills, particularly rights and copyright awareness, and production management. Students should understand intellectual property from the perspective of creators, and should develop the ability to manage creative production, collaborate with specialists, control quality, and coordinate different production roles in professional projects.	The program has considered this suggestion and will reinforce professional practice components related to copyright, ownership, licensing, ethical use of creative materials, and creator rights. In addition, production management will be further emphasized through project-based learning, collaborative assignments, role-based production simulation, budgeting, workflow planning, quality control, and working with external collaborators or production specialists where appropriate. Relevant course descriptions and CLOs will be refined to reflect these professional skills.
